gate width of a first transistor. Examiner respectfully disagrees. Shin clearly st greater than the channel width of transistor M2 (paragraph 16). One skilled in that the tern channel when referring to transistors is synonymous with the term	the art at the time of invention would recognize gate. As a result, Shin discloses that the gate width of a second transistor (M1) is larger than the gate width of a first transistor rejection stands. In response to applicant's argument that there is no suggestion recognizes that obviousness can only be established by combining or modifying claimed invention where there is some teaching, suggestion, or motivation to de	o so found either in the references themselves or in the knowledge generally available to one of ordinary skill in the art. See In re 1988) and In re Jones, 958 F.2d 347, 21 USPQ2d 1941 (Fed. Cir. 1992). In the knowledge generally available to one of ordinary skill in the art that a larger observed to the control of the cont	is case, the motivation can be found in the knowledge generally available to one of ordinary skill in the art that a larger characteristic through the transistor. In order to clarify the rejection of claims 18 and 82. Exa data line has a current source and a precharge circuit connected to it. This data line corresponds to the input line (35) of Knapp in Figure 2. In order to clarify the rejection of claims 88-89, the Examiner points to the claim language which cites that each terminal is merely electrically connected not directly connected. Therefore, a first terminal (one side) of the first switch is electrically connected to the precharge circuit and a second terminal (other side) of the first switch when closed is electrically connected to the second switch or vice versa. In response to applicant's arguments (on pages 13-15 of argument) against the references individually, one cannot show nonobviousness by attacking references individually where the rejections are based on combinations of references. See In re Keller, 642 F.2d 413, 208 USPQ 871 (CCPA 1981); In re Merck & Co., 800 F.2d 1091,
